LIVING AS REDEEMPTIVE
AGENTS

Often when we meet as The King's School Board of Directors or the Executive Team, we deliberate on the type of graduate that we want our school to turn out. How do we raise young adults who not only know the Gospel message, but embody the Gospel in thought and action on a daily basis (Spiritual Formation), while understanding every situation that they experience through God's eyes (Biblical Worldview)?

I would love to see our graduates characterised by three qualities: Incarnational Leadership, Redemptive Purpose and Missional Community. Young people today are yearning for lives of purpose and the knowledge that they can make a meaningful contribution in the field they are called to. They want to know that they are not just studying to get a good job, earn a good salary and live comfortably between pay checks. Where their faith speaks to their role in God's redemptive purposes, they are realising that they were never meant to live a compartmentalised life, faith on one side and the worldly life on the other, but that their faith can in fact inform their recreation, their citizenship and their work.

The Bible calls us 'co-labourers' with Christ and there are always going to be opportunities for Christ-followers to partner with him in works of restoration and renewal. Considering the brokenness of humanity, we can be instruments of reconciliation and play a small part in extending the influence of God's Kingdom on earth.

So, young people, don't let your simple needs dictate your future path. Lead with vision, not needs. Seek God for his particular calling on your life, and develop a personal vision for how you can be a redemptive agent in that area.
