SELF-REGULATION
SKILLS?

FROM THE PRINCIPAL'S DESK...

At The King's School West Rand we actively coach our students in self-regulation skills, a set of skills in the social-emotional and the cognitive sphere, that are essential for an individual to succeed as adults. This prepares children for what is termed executive function and is applicable from Preschool all the way to Matric and beyond. Consider this interesting finding from one of our tech giants.

In 1998, Google was launched by two computer scientists, Sergey Brin and Larry Paige. They immediately created an algorithm to help them locate and recruit other brilliant technology minds.

Fifteen years on, in 2013, they decided to review this recruitment policy, and made an astonishing discovery. Their review study, called Project Oxygen, showed that STEM skills (Science, Technology, Engineering and Maths) ranked lowest of the skills most valued in the company!

Instead, the skills that were most sought after, and are now included in their new hiring policy, were all favouring Social Emotional Learning (SEL):

1. Being a good coach
2. Communicating and listening well
3. Possessing insight into others (social awareness)
4. Empathy and support towards colleagues
5. Critical thinking
6. Problem solving
7. Connecting complex ideas

In recent times, the acronym STEM has actually been modified to be STEAM (Science, Technology, Engineering, Arts and Maths) because researchers have realized that the Arts field is more suited to develop these soft skills.

Let's keep encouraging our kids that learning is not about memorising a bunch of information, but how to handle information and relationships in ways that are life-giving and fruitful.
