Across the world there are governments, businesses and churches who have realised that there is a massive need to train people how to respond to diversity in their communities. Internationally, things like migration, failing economies, the global village phenomenon and persecution have resulted in huge movements of people. Every community in every country has become less homogeneous and more diverse.

In South Africa, with our history of legislated 'separate development' and unequal opportunities, we have an even greater need to position our people to respond to diversity in our 'new dawn' society.

Businesses regularly present seminars and training workshops for diversity training and the emphasis is mostly on diversity awareness, celebration of different cultures and tolerance of our differences. While these certainly are noble aims, I believe that as Christians we need to be aiming higher. I believe God is calling his church to inclusivity rather than just awareness, integration of different people groups into loving communities rather than just celebration of differences, and loving, supportive and just relationships with the other rather than just tolerance.

Revelation 5:9 is clear about the church that God is forming: And they sang a new song, saying, "Worthy are you to take the scroll and to open its seals, for you were slain, and by your blood you ransomed people for God from every tribe and language and people and nation." Every tribe. Every language. Every people. Every nation.

May we, as The King's School, model this church.
